Salvadoran Admits to Battle At Site of Alleged Massacre

By Juan M. Vasquez Los Angeles Times Service

SAN SALVADOR — Defense Minister Gen. José Guillermo García has conceded for the first time that government soldiers fought a battle last December around the village of Mozote, where leftist rebels claim that a massacre took place.

Insurgent sources and the rebel radio station have said that government troops killed about 1,000 civilians in the village during a sweep of Morazán province, a rebel stronghold.

Gen. Garcia also declared in an interview Wednesday that it is in the United States' interest to provide his country with military aid.
"El Salvador could be another Ni-caragua," he said, "and if El Salva-dor falls, so will Central America."

Meeting With U.S. Commander

He disclosed that the military command had ordered members of the security forces not to vote in the March 28 elections, so as to demonstrate the impartiality of the

The interview took place a few hours after Gen. Garcia met pri-vately with Lt. Gen. Wallace H. Nutting, head of the U.S. Southern Command in Panama. He would not disclose the contents of his talk with Gen. Nutting, the key U.S. military officer in Latin America.

Gen. Garcia said military aid to El Salvador "is very important for the United States, because, like it or not, the battle in El Salvador will have military repercussions outside the country."

He added, "It is better to give us aid now than later. Now is the moment. We warned the North Americans months ago about Nicaragua, and they paid no atten-

United Press International reported Jan. 28 that Gen. García had denied knowledge of a military operation by government sol-diers in Mozote. He said Wednesday that he had never denied that an operation took place, but that he had simply said no military sweep was under way when he was asked the question in January.

Conceding that a battle took place in and around Mozote, Gen. García said, "All I can say is that there were a lot of people killed. but not in the way or in the quantity that the subversives allege."

He stated that the village had been the target of "aerial bornbardment," saying this might have been heavy artillery or bombs dropped from an airplane.

An official of a Western embassy had said that there was no evidence of bomb hits in the area of the village, but that the homes had been wrecked by what could have been shots fired through the front doors by recoilless rifles or by ex-

Battle Against Deficits

Mr. Reagan said the increase in the prime lending rate at major banks to 17 percent from 16% Wednesday reflected concern that the Federal Reserve Board might ease monetary policy and that the administration might tolerate everhigher budget deficits. The president's fiscal 1983 spending plan projects a deficit of about $91.5 billion.

He said the Federal Reserve and the administration will work together to produce monetary and fiscal policies that should quell concerns in the money markets. "I will devote the resources of my presidency to keeping deficits down over the next several years,"

However, he also said he would not compromise on his call for an 18-percent increase in military spending next year, a portion of his budget that has become a prime target for congressional crit-

Schmidt Sees a Danger Of European Instability

By John Vinocur New York Times Service

The United States has not fully understood this, he said in an in-terview Wednesday. He also criti-cized the projected U.S. budget deficits as being likely to lead to higher interest rates, worsening economic problems for the rest of the world. If significant steps are not taken in the next two years, Mr. Schmidt warned, every nation could fall into depression.

Mr. Schmidt recommended a better-balanced budget in the United States and said that the best method to achieve that would be to cut spending, raise taxes or

Europe is in greater danger stood so far," he asserted. "The fabric of the economy and the society is endangered by the deepest recession since the middle '30s."

The threat, be said, is building "from quarter to quarter. What I fear is economic and social, and therefore political, unrest: political destabilization as a consequence of economic destabilization.

Unemployment in West Germany, 8.2 percent last month, is the highest in more than 25 years, and the British and French jobless levels surpass those in West Germany. Mr. Schmidt's government has agreed to set up a $4.5-billion jobcreation program, even though many of his country's economists and industrialists are skeptical about its success.

A New Warning

Mr. Schmidt's expression of concern about the U.S. economy's effect on Europe has been constant over the past months, but his warning about consequent politiplained also that the Americans were focusing too much on foreign political dangers and neglecting the economic ones.

Asked if he were calling on the United States to reduce its deficit, Mr. Schmidt replied, "That's ex-actly what I have in mind."

Did he prefer cutting defense spending or raising taxes? "You need not necessarily have to choose between those two alterna-tives," he said. "The first alternative would have to be articulated in a more general way: Cut spending not just defense spending. Or do not enlarge your expenditure in that way in which some states have done it. Or raise taxes. Right?

"Right now the richest economy in the world is at the same time the greatest importer of capital. This is an unhealthy state. Some of the capital we don't even need, it's not being invested. # Focus of Geneva Arms Talks: Public Opinion

By John F. Burns New York Times Service

MOSCOW - The United States and the Soviet Union have dismissed each other's opening bids in the European missile negotiations, leaving the impression that the talks are hope lessly bogged down after only 10 weeks.

The fact is that the proposals put forward by President Reagan and by President Leonid I. Brezhnev are very far apart. There are reasons to believe that both sides are basically concentration. trating for the moment on the battle for public opinion in Western Europe and that they may yet find more common ground at the negotiations in Geneva.

In their opening moves, both the Soviet and U.S. leaders urged deep weapons cuts. Although the detailed proposals appeared to be fashioned for maximum impact on a Western European public eager for a lowering of the nuclear confrontation, and with scant regard for what the other side was likely to accept, the willingness of Washington and Moscow to contemplate major surgery on their nuclear arsenals may eventually give impetus to the

Sudden Departure

Five years ago, when President Jimmy Carter sent Cyrus R. Vance, who was then Sec-retary of State, to Moscow with a proposal for deep cuts in strategic arms, Mr. Vance barely got a hearing. The Soviet leaders, jarred by the sudden departure from previous U.S. strategy, sent Mr. Vance packing.

The Russians dismissed his proposals as a ruse to obtain advantage, and when negotia-tions resumed they focused on more modest goals. Ultimately, the second treaty to limit strategie arms — those of intercontinental range — fell victim to other strains in U.S.-Soviet relations, but some diplomats believe that the Vance initiative may have prompted Soviet strategists to give serious thought to the benefits of deep cuts.

Although Soviet news organizations has been promoting ambitious proposals for the elimination or reduction of nuclear weapons for many years, Soviet negotiators have generally taken a more cautious approach. Recently, however, more than one American visitor has been told that the Soviet leadership regrets having rejected the Vance proposals without fuller consideration.

There could be several reasons. One is Mr. Reagan's weapons program, which appears to have persuaded the Kremiin that it is headed for a new arms race unless new limits are negotiated. Compounding this is the appalling state of the Soviet economy, which makes any further shift of resources to the military sector painful for Soviet leaders.

In the Geneva talks on medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe, there are additional grounds favoring radical cuts. Although the Western European nations were vitally con-

they were not as directly involved as they are in the outcome of the talks on medium-range missiles that would be targeted on European

These pressures had much to do with Mr. Reagan's espousal of the "zero option" pro-posal that the United States formally present-ed in Geneva. The proposal envisages the abandonment of a Western alliance plan to de-ploy a new generation of U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe in return for the Soviet Union's dismantling of the missiles it has already deployed.

Mr. Brezhnev countered with the proposal that the United States cancel plans for its new deployment in return for a pact that would cut existing stockpiles of medium-range weapons in Europe by a third at the end of 1985 and by two-thirds at the end of 1990.

No Western Counterpart

Since the two proposals are based on conflicting premises, they are a minefield of po-tential disadvantage for the other side. Mr. Brezhuev flaentams that the armories of East and West in medium-range weapons are at parity, each with about 1,000 nuclear systems; ion at 3,825 and for the United States at 560. The difference lies in the mix of bombers and missiles that are counted.

The core of the U.S. case is that the Russians, by deploying 250 SS-20 missiles in the

Citicorp Escapes U.S. Legal Action on Currency Dealings

New York Times Service WASHINGTON - The Securities and Exchange Commission last month declined to bring a civil action against Citicorp despite staff findings that the bank's top management bad directed a scheme for seven years that had circumvented and at times violated other countries' tax and currency laws, according to SEC documents and government officials.

The SEC's enforcement staff had recommended the civil action. After a three-year investigation, the enforcement staff concluded that between 1973 and 1980 at least $46 million in profit from currency transactions had been improperly shifted from the bank's branches in Europe, where taxes are high, to branches in the Bahamas, where taxes on profit are much lower.

These shifts were often accomplished through contrived transactions, the staff charged. If, for instance, the bank's branch in London sold Deutsche marks at an artificially low rate to a Bahamas branch, the effect would be to reduce the London branch's profit and increase the earnings regis-

The SEC staff report said authorities in Switzerland, France and West Germany had asserted that Citibank violated currencycontrol laws and tax laws and paid more than $11 million in back taxes and penalties. An Italian investigation apparently is continuing.

Citicorp, in a written statement issued in response to a reporter's questions about the staff findings, said that throughout the various investigations, the bank "has maintained, and we believe proven, that its foreign exchange trading practices and procedures were basically proper."

The statement cited the complexity of international tax laws and said that "nearly four years ago" the bank "ordered changes in procedures wherever we felt there was any room for misunderstanding or dispute" and "reallocated profits among several country operations, where earlier allocations had been questioned or might be

The survey called for "off-book" disguises of transactions because disclosure would result in "tax claims and penalties." In 1977, after a Ciribank em-ployee, David Edwards, expressed suspicions about some of the transactions, the bank changed documents and accounting procedures to further mislead govern-ment authorities. Mr. Edwards, who was unaware of the extent of the scheme or the efforts of senior management to hide it, was dismissed in 1978, one week after complaining to Citibank's board. Mr. Edwards said then that the bank had told him he was being dismissed because he had acted "in a manner that is detrimental to the best interests of Citibank."

Mexico Reported to Train a Force To Defend Its South and Oil Fields

Washington Post Service

MEXICO CITY — Mexico has begun training a 4,000-man quickreaction force to defend the country's southern border and oil fields against the possible intrusion of Central America's turbulent guerrilla wars, according to official

The force is the latest stage of an effort to expand and modernize the Mexican armed forces, which past governments have kept deliberately small and relatively powerless.

Over the past three years, the army has grown by 25 percent to 120,000 soldiers. In August, the first six of 12 F-5 jet fighters are due for delivery from the United States, and about 100 Mexican personnel are receiving U.S. train-ing on the planes. The sale of the planes originally was opposed by the Carter administration on the basis of longstanding U.S. policy against the introduction of advanced aircraft into the region, but it eventually approved the sale.

The $110-million deal will provide a substantial boost for Mexico's antiquated air force and provide the first major step beyond the military requirements considered necessary to maintain internal Mexico also has purchased al-most 40 Mopard anti-tank vehicles from France and ordered about 60 Pilatus planes from Switzerland. Although the single-engine planes normally are used as trainers, sources close to the Mexican military said these will be armed for possible combat purposes.

The government reportedly is shopping in the United States for a radar air-defense system.

Both civilian and military officials here are becoming convinced that Mexico cannot escape the shock waves from the south. New York Times Service WASHINGTON - President Reagan plans to deliver his long-expected speech on improving the well-being of the Caribbean area Tuesday to the Organization of American States, according to White House officials.

With elections for a constituent assembly in El Salvador only six weeks away, the administration is trying to stimulate international backing for the hard-pressed gov-ernment of President Jose Napoleón Duarte. # Mugabe Backers Exult Over Nkomo Dismissal that the four were not involved in The Associased Press

SALISBURY - Thousands of Prime Minister Robert Mugabe's supporters marched through central Salisbury Thursday in support of the firing of his coalition government partner, Joshua Nkomo.

Elsewhere, supporters of Mr. Nkomo expressed anger and shock at the ouster of the veteran nationalist leader.

Mr. Nkomo, president of the Pa-triotic Front, based on the minori-ty Matabele tribe of western Zimbabwe, told reporters his party had quit the fragile 22-month coalition government to form an opposition to Mr. Mugabe's Zimbabwe African National Union.

Mr. Mugabe, whose party is founded on the majority Shona tribe, has 57 of the 100 seats in the national assembly and can alone pass routine legislation. But in the past he has needed Mr. Nkomo's 20 seats to muster the two-thirds majority required for constitutional changes.

Wednesday, Mr. Mugabe announced the dismissal from his 25-member Cabinet of Mr. Nkomo, who was minister without port-folio, two other Patriotic Front ministers and a junior minister from the party. He alleged that they were linked to huge arms caches intended to back a coup.

Mr. Nkomo, who has stridently denied the charges, told reporters he expected four other Patriotic Front ministers and junior ministers to quit and join the opposi-tion. Mr. Mugabe said Wednesday the alleged plot.

But at least one of the four,
Deputy Manpower Minister

Cephas Msipa, said he would not resign. "My country comes first," The Mugabe supporters in Thursday's march, dancing and singing, carried placards calling for a one-party state, a goal of the prime minister, and demanding that Mr. Nkomo be detained, as have been about 15 whites in the last five months, for alleged subversion.

"They are not talking of a one-party state," an onlooker said bitterly. "They are talking of a onetribe state.

In Bulawayo, administrative capital of Matabeleland, most newspapers reporting Mr. Nko-mo's dismissal were sold out early in the morning, "People here can-not believe that it's happened," not believe that it's nappeared, said a woman who owns a dressmaking shop. "They're shocked and they're very angry."

The former supreme comma er of the military wing of Mr. Nko-mo's party, Soviet-trained Dumiso (Black Russian) Dabengwa, told the Bulawayo Chronicle newspa-per in an interview Thursday that arms had been hidden by former guerrillas for fear of civil war.

Mr. Dabengwa, who led Mr. Nkomo's guerrillas in a seven-year war to end white minority rule in this former British colony, said mistrust persists between guerrillas loyal to Mr. Nkomo and those loy-al to Mr. Mugabe.

Party Newspaper Bombed in Syria

DAMASCUS — A car bomb exploded Thursday in the building housing the newspaper of Syria's ruling Ba'ath Party, and the government blamed the outlawed Moslem Brotherhood.

The state news agency said a small number of employees of the newspaper, Al-Baath, were slightly injured by flying glass. The agency said guards at the building, which also houses the Information Ministry, killed the man who parked the booby-trapped car.

The Defense Ministry said earlier Thursday that security forces had thwarted a Moslem Brotherhood uprising in Hama, although there was no word about re-opening of roads into the town, closed two weeks ago when the government operation started.

TEL AVIV - Palestinians on the occupied West Bank of the Jordan River stoned Israeli vehicles Thursday in a second day of protests over the closure of Bir Zeit university near Ramallah.

According to Israeli military spokesmen, assailants smaahed the windshield of an Israeli bus as it passed the Qalandia refugee camp on the northern outskirts of Jerusalem, and stones were thrown at an Israeli vehicle on its way to a Jewish settlement at Ofra, near Ramallah.

At the same time, the new U.S. envoy to the Palestinian antonomy negotiations, Richard Fairbanks, held a round of introductory talks in Jerusalem. Officials said Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir repeated Israel's aim of achieving some kind of agreement before April 25, the date Israel completes its evacuation of the occupied Egyptian Sinai Peninsula.

Getting Pregnant Is More Difficult Over Age 30, French Study Shows

Washington Past Service WASHINGTON - A study released Thursday has discouraging news for women who delay having children: It documents a significant decline in the ability to get pregnant after the age of 30.

In the largest research project of its kind, scientists found that difficulties in conceiving are "slight but significant" among women in their early 30s and "marked" after 35. Although it has long been assumed that fertility diminishes with age, it has been difficult to document whether this represents a true biological change or a decrease in sexual activity. officials Wednesday were considering asking the Western allies to go along with a new kind of economic sanction against Moscow.

Virtues of Option

Under this plan, Western European governments would agree to cut off new credits and loan guarantees to the Soviet Union a step that probably would force Moscow to pay cash for Western technology and equipment, since private banks presumably would be reluctant to extend credit without government backing.

Officials supporting this option say it has several virtues. It would allow the Western Europeans to go on selling nonstrategic equipment and technology to the Soviet Union. Up to now the allies have refused to go along with U.S. re-quests to limit the sale of billions of dollars worth of equipment for the Siberian pipeline, arguing that too many jobs were at stake.

At the same time, however, it would force the Soviet Union onto cash basis in business dealings with the West. Some officials contend that this would, in turn, make sources such as gold and diamonds to pay for Western imports.

A European source said that while this would not end future East-West business deals it would slow them down considerably, since the Soviet Union and other East European countries count heavily on foreign credits to finance their trade.

Hermes, the West German government insurance agency, has guaranteed substantial amounts of the West German bank loans for the Soviet pipeline project. And it has also guaranteed $1.8 billion of the $4.6 billion in West German

Earlier Proposal

An earlier proposal backed by hard-liners in the administration would involve extending the Dec. 30 sanctions against U.S. exports of equipment for the gas pipeline to European companies that man-ufacture such equipment with U.S.

In his letter to Mr. Reagan, the president of the Chamber of Commerce said that such extraterritori-al controls "will only aggravate further our already poor international reputation for commercial reliability."

The letter was the strongest sign seen yet of the business community's concern over the administration's East-West trade policy. The administration has been torn for weeks between its basic sympathies for business and its desire to reduce the Western economic relationship with the Soviet bloc.

At a breakfast meeting with re-porters Wednesday, the chairman of the chamber, Donald Kendall, said he "totally disagreed" with the president's opposition to construction of the pipeline.

U.S. Joint Chiefs Head Seeks to Change System

By Charles Mohr New York Times Service
WASHINGTON — Gen. David

C. Jones, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, says he will try during his last months in office to "snme substantial changes" in the organization and workings of the Joint Chiefs system, seeking more authority for the chairman and more unified military planning. Gen. Jones will finish his second two-year term as chairman in June and cannut be reappointed to the post in peacetime. He previously served four years as Air Force chief of staff.

He said he was not seeking a classical "general staff" system on the European model, not unification of the branches of the armed services, but modest changes in the present system, which has been changed only marginally since its establishment in 1947. Gen. Jones outlined his thinking in an article for a business publication, Direc-tors and Boards, and at a meeting with reporters Wednesday.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff comprise the chairman, the chief of navai operations, the Army and Air Force chiefs of staff and the commandant of the Marine Corps. They are served by a staff of slight-ly more than 1.300 officers and enlisted personnel from the four services and some civilians.

Each of the four service ehiefs also commands a separate service. competing for scarce budget money and served by a very large "ser-vice staff" with more interest in its own institution than in interservice

One of Gen. Jones' major recnmendations is to limit the involvement of the single-service military staffs in the working of the

"When a service chief acts on a service matter he should receive advice from his service staff and when he acts on a joint matter he should receive his advice from the joint staff," Gen. Jones wrote. "However, since the beginning, service chiefs bave relied almost exclusively on their service staffs in preparing for joint meetings."

The general said be was not adocating a major shift of power to the chairman. The services would still generate their own budget requests and command their component units. The chairman would have a somewhat larger personal staff and could "advise the secretary of defense on an integrated, overall strategy ... the decision authority would still be with the secretary.

The Joint Chiefs are required by law to make a formal report to the secretary of defense when they cannot agree. Gen. Jones said Wednesday that this leads to strong pressure to arrive at hland consensus. He said the aim of his proposals was to improve planning and innovation in dealing with strategy and military readiness. The current system, he contended, emphasizes budget matters and "efficient" peacetime management of the services. Changes in strategy tend to threaten traditional service roles or a redistribution of money, he said.

The requirements for unanimity have also helped prevent a broad interservice view in the joint staff. Gen. Jones said, noting that studies cannot even be begun until agreement is reached on "the terms of reference for a study.

He contended that there should be more incentives and rewards for duty on joint military affairs, in-cluding the joint staff and joint combat commands. Senior officers now usually serve less than two years on the joint stall and lower ranks 30 months, with their future promotions and assignments controlled by their mother services.

Gen. Jones suggested that the Joint Chiefs chairman be given limited influence nn assignments and promotion for officers whn serve in joint military work. He admitted that the individual services would be likely to resist such a

According to Mr. Blix, India, Pakistan, South Africa and Israel were of the most immediate concern. None of the four, he noted, was willing to sign the Nonproliferation Treaty. # Theater in a Vacuum

The vacuum that is the Reagan administration's Middle East policy is hurting the president and the country. Into that vacuum pop the secretary of state and the secretary of defense, each cultivating a private departmental interest without even a pretense of sharing a common one. It is terrific political theater to see two Cabinet officers vying with each other for bureaucrane supremacy virtually in full public view. But it is a damaging comment on President Reagan's disinclination to accept the responsibility of his office and govern. And it is also, from the point of view of the national interest, absurd.

The latest episode of the Haig-Weinberger follies centers on the visit by the secretary of defense to Jordan, where he at least raised the question of selling King Hussein top-ofthe-line aircraft and missiles to keep him from shopping in Moscow. By the time Secretary Weinberger's purpose and the various remarks and asides of his party had filtered back to Washington, the Israelis were invoking their own nightmare of American abandonment, and President Reagan was forced to step in and calm things down.

There seems to be a real personality clash between Mr. Weinberger, who distinguishes between the Israeli "people" and the Israeli "government," and Menachem Begin, who makes no secret of his intense distrust of the secretary. This is unfortunate, but it is not crucial. What is crucial in this episode is that Mr. Weinberger was flying his own kite, seeking to strengthen American links with friendly Arab states, evidently without regard to previous American assurances to Israel or to Secretary Haig's own recent diplomatic visitations. How can it help the secretary of state to nudge along the Palestinian autonomy talks if at that very moment the secretary of defense is pleading with an Arab leader who spurns those talks to accept the favor of hot new American arms?

Whatever his intent, Mr. Weinberger's effect was quite likely to bolster the Israeli hard line in ways that can lead to no good. Whether he will be appreciated in Arab quarters for having made the old college try or dismissed for not being able to deliver we don't know. But either way, how can it possibiv help the secretary of state?

There is a sense, of course, in which not having a Mideast policy — a coordinated plan to pursue both diplomatic goals and se-curity goals — is in itself a policy. The securi-ty side — the arms-selling, pact-making side obviously has the strength under such conditions. To engage in this arms and pact business means closing ranks as much as possible with Arab states, demonstrating to them that the United States is loosening its special commitment to Israel, and accepting as natural and even desirable the inevitable consequent collisions with the Israelis. But this is an extraordinarily dangerous and reckless course, even a dishonorable one.

Fortunately, there is an alternative, a very difficult one. It entails seeing the region as a whole, pursuing security interests firmly but with due respect to the sensitivities of all states of the region, and accepting the political centrality of the need for Israeli-Palestinian coexistence. Right now, Mr. Reagan is over-engaged on the security side and inattentive on the political side. He is asking for trouble, and he is getting it.

OPEC and the Saudis

For years, everybody has been calling OPEC a cartel. Now the world is going to find out whether that is correct. A true cartel is capable of enforcing production cuts to keep up its prices. That is what a cartel is for. The question of reducing production is now under discussion — rather tense discussion, evidently — within OPEC. Like most of the questions that confront OPEC, its answer depends entirely on Saudi Arabia.

There is nothing obscure about the cause of OPEC's troubles. Extraordinarily high prices are having the usual effect. Consumers around the world are making do with less oil, and producers outside OPEC are pumping more of it. OPEC, so far, has carried the whole burden of adjustment. Its production is down about one-third since the last great crisis in 1979. That is an enormous decline. The first stages of it were easy enough. By 1979 several of the OPEC governments were selling more oil than good conservation policy dictated, and they were not unhappy to choke back the flow. Then Iran and Iraq went to war with each other, with another sharp decrease in world production.

But as the need for reductions continues, it begins to threaten the development requirements of some countries, such as Nigeria, and the military ambitions of others, such as Libya. That is why the producers have begun to discount their prices in anxious efforts to maintain the flow of cash. And that is why all eyes turn toward the Saudis.

When they forced the rest of OPEC to conform to their price policy last fall, there was an implicit bargain that they would protect those prices from erosion. At the time, the Saudis lowered their production. But now the market is again heavily oversupplied. If Saudi output does not come down, and quite a lot, prices are going to keep falling. It is true that Saudi Arabia currently has far more money than needed, but it is also true that the country has become accustomed to a life that spends far more money than needed.

That leaves the Saudi rulers with an interesting choice. Meanwhile, smart people will remember that the great oil price escalation of the 1970s resulted from three political events — an Arab-Israeli war, an Iranian revolution and an Iranian-Iraqi war. Smart people will keep in mind that there may be more unexpected events ahead in the Middle East, the world's least stable region. Those people will regard lower oil and gasoline prices as the most fragile kind of good fortune, and they will keep shifting away from dependence on oil - knowing that, next month or next year, for utterly unpredictable reasons, the price may once again be rising.

THE WASHINGTON POST.

Time to Act on Minerals

Americans cheered last March when President Reagan declared himself eager to reduce dependence on imported minerals. The U.S. economy had paid a high price for failure to prepare for the oil shocks of 1974 and 1979. A wise society would guard against such disruptions in other critical materials.

But a strategic minerals policy has yet to emerge from the White House. And there is growing doubt about the administration's commitment or its technical capacity to translate oratory into cost-effective reform. What is needed is a close analysis, mineral by mineral, of the consequences of import dependence and the practical alternatives.

On its face, the problem seems manageable. The economy depends on hundreds of minerals, a few dozen of which come mostly from abroad. Government stockpiles would reduce vulnerability to supply disruptions. So would more domestic production, which government might encourage. That, surely, is what Reagan hoped to do. Product by product, however, it is difficult to measure national vulnerability or estimate the adequacy of stockpiles. It is known, for example, how much manganese is consumed each year by industry. It is not really known how much of American industry would be disrupted if denied manganese. Those who minimize the problem point to the ease with which substitutes were found when cobalt supplies from Zaire were cut off in 1978.

In making these judgments, many also fear the influence of special economic interests.

Government stockpiles of silver, for example, are undoubtedly excessive, but producers are blocking any sale therefrom in order to hold up prices. Other mining companies want to be subsidized to extract cobalt from lowgrade domestic ores. And Western congressmen are clamoring for the right to open eco-logically fragile lands to mining.

So the experts disagree about the specifics of a sound policy. The principles that should govern, however, are fairly clear:

 Stockpiles should come first. There is a good reason for importing some minerals available at home - it is cheaper. For the same reason, it would generally be cheaper to build stockpiles from foreign sources than to subsidize more domestic production.

· Private solutions are preferable. The U.S. government should protect the country against import disruptions that would affect defense industries. But there is no obvious reason why the government should have to maintain mineral inventories, free of charge, for private enterprises.

 Keep planning flexible. Changing technology can make any policy obsolete. There is no point, for example, in stockpiling bauxite, now that domestic industry has stopped using it in making aluminum. Continuing research will avoid such waste.

Reagan seems to understand that a sound minerals policy is an important element of defense. He should by now have seen some plans for turning sentiment into policy.

Russia — A Colossus In Colossal Trouble

By Stanley Karnow

WASHINGTON — The crack-down on the dissidence in Poland may have been a political triumph for the Soviet leaders, but they are paying an exorbitant eco-nomic price. The victory may cost more than it was worth.

The Polish crisis is imposing severe strains on the Soviet economy at a time when, because of its appalling weaknesses, it can least afford extra burdens.

afford extra burdens.

Meanwhile, the trouble in Poland has badly damaged the other economies of Eastern Europe.

All this suggests, I believe, that Moscow will face increasing pressures during the period ahead. And its problems are likely to be aggravated by changes in its ruling hierarchy, as its old and alling chieftains disappear and a power struggle takes place.

So it seems to me that the Soviet Union ought to be viewed as a desperately distressed giant and oot, in the manner of the Reagan administration, as a colossus capable of world domination.

Big Borrowing

In recent weeks the Russians have been selling unusually large quantities of gold, diamonds and oil on Western markets in an ur-gent effort to raise cash for bigger imports of grain from the West, af-ter a third disastrous harvest in a row. Estimates are they will buy 43 million tons of grain this year from the United States and other Westem producers

The funds are also destined to prop up Poland, whose economy had been collapsing even before its labor unions began to rise in protest. Soviet assistance to Po-land until now has probably exceeded $10 billion, part of it earmarked to service the huge Polish debt to Western banks.

Moscow has also been borrowing enormous sums in the West to finance such projects as the planned natural gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe. Soviet loans for the pipeline total more than $2 billion, and the Kremlin asked West German banks for additional credit in December

Under the weight of this load, the Russians have been forced to slash aid to their East European satellites. Not long ago, for instance, they cut oil deliveries to Eastern Europe by 10 percent, preferring instead to peddle the fuel in the West for hard currency.

The East Europeans have been suffering as well from the disarray in Poland, which has been unable to supply them with the coal, industrial equipment and food that are vital to their development.

Underlying this gigantic sham-bles is a basic reality. The Soviet Union, which once touted itself as the global model of the future, has proved a dismal economic failure. It is fair surmise that its population might be better off today if the revolution had never occurred.

A fundamental flaw in the sysflexible structure that might threaten authority, Soviet leaders since the days of Stalin have relied on an overcentralized and conservative bureaucracy that cannot adapt to the country's diversity.

Military Load

Not only are Soviet bureaucrats egregiously corrupt in defense of their privileges, but their direction of the economy is marked by extravagant waste. As Anthony Robinson of London's Financial Times has pointed out, they have long been blind to the connection between production costs and prices. Striving to fulfill their aspirations, the Soviet leaders also devote scarce resources to a military

U.S. Grumbling About Cuba

By Flora Lewis

WASHINGTON — Ominous VV but ambiguous rumbles about what the United States might do to Cuba have become a current staple of foreign policy noises from Washington, and they are hard to read. Does the Reagan dministration have firm intentions? What are they?

The more you dig into this, the less you find. Grant the statements about a new flow of Soviet weapons to Cuba. But Washington's unwillingness to provide hard de-tails is explained alternately as protecting sources and as prudently avoiding over-dramatics like President Carter's useless flap about "discovering" a Soviet brigade on the island.

These are contradictory stands. Do they mean that things are really getting worse, or that Washington wants to signal to Havana and Moscow that it will be very angry if they do? It depends which senior officials you ask.

There is no charge that the 1962
Soviet pledge not to send "offensive" arms to Cuba has been violated, but it is hard to define and is usually interpreted to mean nuclear weapons in this context.

In any case, the administration does not claim that the warnings have achieved their advertised purpose of stopping "the export of Cuban subversion" to Central America and the Caribbean. But it has no answer to the question of whether the deliberate campaign of "not ruling out" the use of force may be provoking the arms buildup as a defensive reaction. Cuba's policy of aiding rebels is not likely to change under pressure.

Meanwhile, Fidel Castro has been sending quiet signals that he wants to extend contacts and negotiate with the United States. Nothing significant happened at the meeting late last year between Secretary of State Alexander Haig and Cuba's vice president, beyond the fact of the meeting itself, officials say. Both sides simply repeated their old positions their old positions.

But recently Castro told a Republican congressman, Hamilton Fish, that he would take back criminals and sick people dumped on the United States during the 1980 exodus if a face-saving exchange were arranged. And he re-leased four American prisoners.

The signs and gestures have been coldly received in Washington. There is a lot of talk about Cuba but little interest in talking to Cuba. It is taken for granted that Castro's overtures are a tacti-cal attempt to defuse U.S. antagonism, not a genuine desire to im-prove relations and ease his country's total dependence on Moscow, as some foreign diplomats think.

Certainly, there is plenty of reason to worry about the future in the Caribbean basin. Ferment is developing through the area. To the extent that the United States is seen as hostile to urgently needed social change, and to some people that is how it looks, hostility to the United States is growing.

A spread of Cuban influence, backed by the Kremlin, would indeed represent a strategic threat.

President Reagan will spell out
America's promised Caribbean
Basin Initiative next week. Drafts are still being revised at the White House, but the latest word is that the speech will offer trade incentives and not much aid.

No doubt regional hopes are ex-cessive. The United States and the industrial West could not simply cure impoverished, frustrated societies even if they had unlimited funds to offer. The main thing that development experts have learned in their trials is how hard it is to beed peaceful change.
But it is the only reliable way to improve regional security in the long run. In the short run, encouragement and sustained hope make all the difference. Forcing people to choose sides in an East-West confrontation that seems irrelevant to their lives is a way to breed enemies.

A Canadian partiamentary comrission that studied the area's urgent problems for nearly a year concluded that "potentially the most dangerous threat to security in these regions [is] the growing confrontation between the United States and Cuba."

Change in the area is necessary and inevitable, the commission also said. "Any attempt therefore to characterize this process as derived essentially from an alien ide-ology should be resisted. Moreover, social change in these countries will evolve from a wide range of development models because of their rich and complex histories. It is unrealistic to expect them to blindly imitate the experience of others. Canada should recognize and support such phuralism in Lat-in America and the Caribbean." All Canadian parties were repre sented on the commission. They were saying, in effect, that the United States is making a mistake in stressing a Cuban and Commu-nist challenge rather than a human and social challenge.

> It may be the Reagan administration is not talking foreign affairs at all, but domestic politics.

Why is Washington on such a different tack, and what does the administration hope to achieve with its threats and warnings? The more one looks into the facts, the harder it is to avoid suspicion that the administration is not talking foreign affairs at all but domestic politics. The noises seem to be re-quired to silence right-wing, charges of being "soft on Commu-nists." Intentions are hard to read ably argued about and finally executed.

And the only background ooise you heard before or after was, naturally, American. There America had been beforehand, arguing about what the Russians would probably do - an outright Hungary-style invasion? and what the response should or shouldn't be. Afterward, once again surprised, Americans took to their telephones to ask each other what that was they thought they had just heard on the news. Confirming the worst, we at once settled into our familiar hand-wringing and acrimony about whose fault it was and what to do. They do the deed, and we hold the hearing.

Sometimes I have this fantasy that the Soviet system falls apart and begins to resemble America's because America has dropped a nonlethal but absolutely destructive weapon called the First Amendment bomb on them, followed up by a biological agent called virus of congressmen. There would also be an exotic strain called disaffected Cabinet officer.

Imagine. Pravda and Izvestia would have been competing to expose the policy on Poland. The leakers would have been in full gush. The denials, as is always true, would have been telling much of the story — a story for which the headlines write themselves: A KGB Plan to "Destabilize" Solidarity Charged - Politburo Source Assails Martial-Law Option — Brezhnev Says Martial-Law Option Not Ruled Out — Central Committee De-advantage, America's disheveled blathering can appear all the more reckless and selfdamaging. If there is someone, somewhere, who has not got the idea by now that the Reagan administration is perplexed, divided and, in any case, is oot entirely free to do what it wants (once it figures out what that is) in Central America or Central Europe, well, that someone can't be very bright. Americans advertise our imprecision and dis-agreement, which also go by such names as checks and balances and pluralism.

You cannot really change the gabby, exasperating nature of the society.

the different branches of government. It is also that this administration, maybe even more than some of its unruly predecessors, seems given to a lot of public and semi-public infighting - to the joy and glory of those of us who are paid to write about it and those who have been elected to the Congress that strives to govern along with it.

We are all having fun, but I find it unima-ginable that this festival of democracy is doing much to help along such serious strate-gies as the administration is able to contrive; thanks to the side that lost the internal battle, the secret news rarely seems to hold until the last black limousine has pulled away from whatever marble palace it was that the top-level meeting was held in. And not all of the disclosure is sub rosa or indirect. We now have a whale of a battle going — right up there and out loud — over the Polish debt and what the administration should do in relation to it. The Weinberger-Haig conflict, in general, gets more, not less, vivid every day.

This stark contrast between Soviet secrecy and discretion and compulsive American revelation sooner or later threatens to put every president berserk. And why wouldn't it? The problem is that there is very little that can be done to change the situation and a great deal that should oot be attempted, not just because it won't work, but because it will do positive harm as well.

I think the difference between the two systems in this respect does have implications for a number of activities — the character of agreements with the Soviets, for example, and the degree of security and verification needed on any risk-laden deal. They can break an agreement without being found out, But the presidential reflex to plug every one of those leaks and classify more things secret is something else again. It is as understandable in origin as it is doomed in practice.

Right now in Washington there is a great effort under way at this plugging and caulk-ing and finding out who is doing the trouble-some talking. The guys with the short foreheads, as the security men are endearingly known, are going around town questioning this one and that one about the innumerable eaks. The polygraphs are out. And terrible legislative and administrative steps are planned to restrict more information and to punish harshly those who disseminate it. The thing about all this is that it won't work but it might do harm - including to the administration that promotes it and sees it into law. The harm will come from what grows in the darkness when too much information is put beyond the reach of any but a few - a few who are bound to grow arrogant (as we have seen) and to tromp off on their own illconceived secret missions. But beyond that, it can't be done. Of course there is a range of material that needs to be protected. But you cannot really change the sloppy, ebullicat, gabby, exasperating nature of the society, especially of the political society, and I don't think, even with the screaming disadvantage this creates in many overseas relationships, that you would want to. You can distort the social and political process with draconian measures. But you can never stop the leaks or the determined self-expression or the fact that we can't by our very nature do it their way. A president can only learn to make the best of the system as it is. The alternative in a famous phrase, is to "destroy" the unruly democratic culture "in order to save it."

Germans, Americans and a Forced Marriage

MUNICH — How can West Germans and Americans patch up what many see as a deep rift in their relationship? The question is being asked with concern on both sides of the Atlantic, and was the theme of two symposia that I attended recently. The question is predicated on assumptions that are open to chal-lenge. Are relations indeed so disharmonious? If yes, is the phenomenon all that novel? Opinion polls show the U.S. popularity rating here to be higher than at any time since 1965, and most West Germans continue to express confidence in NATO. Even if the pulse-takers are wrong and relations are poor, is that new? It is after all a forced marriage, and many older Americans and Germans can recall being criticized at home for extending the hand of friendship.

Rapport has generally been limited to encounters in GI bars. A glance through my bulging file folder produced yellowed clippings dating back to the late 1950s and early 1960s with headlines and editorials as disturbing as today's.

In those decades only the names of the chancellors and presidents and the momentary issues of disa-greement changed. Only when Konrad Adenauer and Dwight Eisenhower (or John Foster Dulles) made music together were dissonant notes rare, although in those days, too, there were episodes' of mutual distrust. Later, Adenauer's relationship with John Rennedy was as tense as Ludwig Erhard's with Lyndon Johnson and Helmut Schmidt's with Jimmy Carter.

an in German-American relations, having served as a young editor on the U.S. military government's Neue Zeitung in 1946. She has blame for the media, lamenting the dearth of interpretative reporting about West Germany in the United States and the distorted picture of America that West Germans get from their news media. But she also sees more fundamental problems having to do with generations and education. The founder generations of the special West German-U.S. relationship recognized the two countries' interdependence, but the successor generations in politics, business, education, journalism and the arts "are drifting apart."

Americans "for whom know-

She has a starting budget of 4.5 million Deutsche marks in 1982. The main obstacle, she says, is "unadulterated ignorance" on both sides of the Adantic Her ambitious inter-ministerial program, aided by foundations and private industry, calls for non-touristic people-to-people contacts, junkets and seminars involving the new generation of policy- and opinion-makers. It will be holstered by stepped-up efforts by the Foreign Ministry's Goethe Institutes — of which there are 28 in Latin America but only four in the United States. Similarly astute efforts might be envisaged by the U.S. State Department's International

Pakistan Riot Surprised Zia, U.S. Asserts

The Associated Press WASHINGTON - The State Department says it does not be-lieve that President Mohammed Zia ul-Haq of Pakistan knew in advance about an attack on the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad in 1979.

In a written response submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the department also said there was "no evidence to sug-gest" that any of the attackers held or holds a post in the Pakistani

The department's answers were in response to questions submitted during a hearing Nov. 12 on a sale of F-to fighters to Pakistan. A pro-posal to block the sale was subsequently rejected.

Two U.S. servicemen, two Pakistani employees of the embassy and a demonstrator were killed during the attack Nov. 21, 1979, 17 days after Iranian militants occu-pied the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and seized hostages.

On June 19, 1980, the State Department told Congress that cases were still pending in Pakistani courts against several persons ar-rested after the attack.

In its latest response, contained in a newly published hearing transcript, the department said it had asked for an update on the prosecution and was waiting for the in-

KUWAIT — The first kidnap-ping of a child for ransom here last week has sent shock waves through this tiny Gulf nation, whose huge oil wealth makes it potentially fer-tile ground for such activities.

While the two kidnappers involved were caught within 20 hours after they seized the child of a well-known Kuwaiti businessman, the fact that one was a Kuwaiti caused a major sensation.

Until recently, Kuwait was relatively crime-free, particularly free of rapes, murders and kidnapping. But the onset of what Kuwaitis like to think of as Western social diseases was highlighted last fall when three persons were hanged for kidnapping. for kidnapping, raping and killing two girls; then two others were hanged for the armed robbery and murder of a money changer. Particularly compared with the United States, Kuwait has a low incidence of violent crime. Knwaitis tend to blame what prob-lems they have on the large foreign community — particularly Asians, Egyptians and Palestinians — that constitutes more than half the country's 1,2 million population and 70 percent of the work force.

But the latest kidnapping was the first time that such a crime in-volved a Kuwaiti from a well-off family. He was identified as Fahd Abdul Salem Najar, 26, an interior decorator. His accomplice was

The first call came within hours of the kidnapping from the Hilton Hotel, where Mr. Najar had a friend working as a barber who allowed him to use his phone. The friend was apparently innaware of the kidnapping.

Beach Home Raided

The friend later told police he enew Mr. Najar had access to a beach home in Kheiran, 80 miles south of the city. The police raided it, seized the kidnappers and freed the child unharmed During 20 hours of suspense, ev-

Perhaps most disturbing to Kuwaitis was why Mr. Najar, him-self the son of a Kuwaiti businessnan, would be involved in such a crime. The answer seems to be that the enormous wealth of this country is spawning its own social dis-eases. Kuwait has the highest per capita income in the world about $16,000 last year, according to a World Bank report.

Failed in Studies

Mr. Najar, it seems from press reports and one person who knew him, had failed in his studies and was taking drugs while working in his father's business. The week before the kidnapping, he either left the family or was disowned be-cause of a disagreement with his

Many Kuwaitis are calling for his death to make an object lesson out of him. But most observers ex-pect that, since Mr. Najar is a Kuwaiti and the child was not harmed, he will be sentenced to life in prison instead.

"I do not subscribe to the theory that a company that violates tax and exchange control regulations is a bad corporation and disclosure of illegal conduct should be forced as a prophylactic measure," Mr. Fedders argued in the staff report.

Separately, the commission's Office of the General Counsel and the Division of Corporation Finance also argued against any enforcement action. They submit-ted a memorandum that described the violations as insignificant and argued that further disclosure would not benefit the bank's shareholders or potential investors.

Citing a recent internal SEC precedent, the two divisions argued that "it would be inappropri-ate to allege disclosure violations based on unadjudicated illegal or improper conduct by a company's officers and directors unless there were affirmative representations as to management's honesty and integrity in some document.

The two divisions also contended that Citicorp's "management made a reasonable and standard business judgment" by taking the "most profitable course," despite the knowledge that it was probably unlawful and risked penalties.

The banking practice at issue in the Citicorp case is the "parking" of overseas currency transactions. Parking is an accounting procedure that shifts, on paper, the profits from the sale or purchase of some currency out of high-tax

Such shifting is common among multinational institutions, and it is legal provided that the paper transactions are not contrived and do not violate tax laws or exceed limits on local currency holdings imposed by various monetary au-thorities. A "contrived" transaction is one in which there is no legitimate buyer and seller and the price is inconsistent with prevail-

Looking at Transactions

European tax authorities, much like the in the United States, look at transactions between related parties - such as a sale between a Citibank branch in Paris to one in the Bahamas - to see whether they are contrived. Liability for taxes cannot legally be avoided by an artificial transaction designed simply for that purpose.

The foreign investigations of Ci-tibank's activities, begun after Mr. Edwards' charges were made public, provide some insight into some specifics of Citibank's parking.
From 1974 to 1978, Citibank

Switzerland had more than $83 million in profit from trading cur-rencies, $51.5 million of which was posted in Switzerland and reported to Swiss authorities and $31.5 million of which was not, according to the commission's staff report.

Citibank agreed to pay Switzer-land about $5.7 million in "back taxes" and "administrative fees" for $7.5 million in profit transferred to Nassau, the Bahaman capital, during that time in two clearly artificial transactions, the cluded that Citibank Paris underreported approximately $550,000 for transactions in which Citibank Paris 'virtually simultaneously bought and sold non-French currates, which resulted in a loss on cording to the staff report.

These parking transactions were made in at least three different ways, varying "only in the ease of detection," the report said. In each instance the transactions were "completely controlled" by the Enropean branches and usually intwo weeks ago, the Interior Minister have accounted. The present try have announced. The pregnant woman's disappearance had prompted an appeal from 30 of Argentina's leading cultural and political figures.

It was the first disappearance denounced this year by local human rights organizations. They said they believed it was a political kidnapping because of Mrs. Martinez' connection with the outlawed Socialist Workers Party.

The ministry's communique Wednesday said the death of Ana Maria Martinez, 31, was being treated as a homicide. It did not say how she was killed. A coalition of artists and politicians headed by writers Jorge Luis Borges and Ernesto Sabato had appealed Monday for an investigation into her kidnapping.

The last two years have produced only a handful of such cases. But human rights groups here and abroad say between 6,000 and 15,000 people disappeared after being detained by security forces between 1975 and 1979. "Strictly confidential treatment is necessary," the bank survey said, because "disclosure could mean instructions to discontinue, and most involve tax claims and penalties."

At a 1975 conference of all the treasurers from Citibank's European branches, the executives were noted as saying that the risk of detection and sanctions was "reasonable as compared to the risk of earning loss which would follow if the practice is stopped," according to the staff report.

In July, 1977, four months after Mr. Edwards blew the whistle, the senior management made changes in the booking of parking transac-tions, "which had the effect of making parking less detectable by foreign regulators," according to the staff report.

Also in 1977, internal Citibank documents were changed to mislead the Swiss and Italian au-

The SEC did not try to uncov the full extent of questionable parking transactions by Citibank. Though it reviewed the bank's European transactions, for example, it did not look at parking transac-tions involving artificial rates at Citibank branches in eight Asian conntries.

Last April, after pressure from U.S. officials, Citicorp's board called for the bank's foreign exchange and money market activi-ties to be conducted legally, according to SEC documents. The board permitted parking to contin-ue, but only at rates "that do not violate local law."

During the SEC investigation. Citicorp did not dispute any of the facts or evidence, but said that the matters were not material and that the bank's internal controls had been strengthened as a result of

The Timelessness of Dublin's Trinity

By P.D. James

DUBLIN — It must be a rare visitor to Dublin who does not place the College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity — Trinity College — high on the list of sight-seeing priorities. Some national monuments are difficult to find monuments are difficult to find; Trinity is impossible to miss. There can be few universities that occupy so privileged a site, 40 secluded acres of harmonious stone, grass and trees in the heart of a capital

To return to Trinity as a visitor after more than 30 years is to feel an immediate sense of recognition.
One comes back to loved buildings as to old friends; they change in externals but not in spirit. The long Palladian west front facing College Green seems a little grub-bier, perhaps, in contrast to the gleaming sweep of the oewly cleaned Bank of Ireland; the traffic is busier, the city seems to press more insistently against Trinity's railings. But John Henry Foley's statue of the statesman Henry Grattan still stands on its island above the swirl of traffic, holding out its hand toward the college as if to proclaim that here it still is. The entrance is flanked by statues, also by Foley, of two of Trin-ity's most illustrious graduates, the poet Oliver Goldsmith and the statesman Edmund Burke, Goldsmith in his breeches and buckled shoes stands, left foot forward, in insouciant ease, reading from a book held in his left palm. Burke, aggressive air. Their plinths stand on twin lawns behind the railings, on land first leased to the college in the 1680s for half a crown a year "and a couple of fat capons at Christmas, yearly to the Lord Mayor." Behind them the arched portico seems physically to draw the city's traffic (and no buses grind more than the yellow buses of Dublin,) through Theodore Jacobsen's west front, and into the austere and harmonious peace of what must be one of the most impressive academic squares in Euope.

This magnificent courtyard of cobblestones and lawns was a 19th-century innovation formed by the merging of Parliament Square (so called because it was funded by the old Irish Parliament) and Library Square. Trinity is cruciform, the cross formed by six squares. The visitor passes through Front Square to this immense area. To the north is Botany Bay, a residential square named for the Australian penal colony, so it is rumored, because of the unruliness of its for-mer student inhabitants. To the south lies Fellows Square contain-ing the Arts and Social Science Building, opened in 1978 when the cruciform design was completed. To the east is New Square, which contains the museum, arguably the most beautiful building in Trinity.

Most Successful Innovation

But it is the merging of Parliament and Library Squares with the great campanile, with its two an-cient and sonorous bells, rising from the center that is perhaps Trinity's most successful architectural innovation. Here buildings and cobblestones, lawns and carefully tended trees under the everchanging Dublin sky form an impression of austere but totally satisfying peace and harmooy.

Two temple-like buildings, each with four Corinthian pillars, face each other across Parliament Square, both the work of the 18th-century architect Sir William Chambers. To the north is the chapel; to the south the theater, usually known as the Examination Hall Inside, too, they are similar in design, with a barrel-vaulted ceiling and long apsed auditorium. But they are totally different in mood. The theater is the more immediately spectacular with its dec-orated ceiling by one of Dublin's finest stuccoers, Michael Staple-ton, its carved organ case, its gild-ed oak chandelier, its nine large portraits of college worthics. But I prefer the simplicity of the chapel. I like the way in which the curve of the gallery echoes that of the apse, the fine carving of the paired pilas-ters, the tall colleginte pews so reminiscent of Cambridge college chapels. Nothing is superfluous;

There is, of course, nothing here of the original Elizabethan Trinity. Those who seek some trace of those early origins can find it hidden away behind the chapel in the simple memorials to some of the men connected with the foundation of the college. The stone was should have been the first Elizabeth, easily that most learned of English queens. But her motives were not entirely academic. The intention was that "knowledge and civility might be increased by the instruction of our people there, whereof many have usually heretofore used to travaill into ffrance, Italy and Spaine to gett learning in such foreign universities, whereby they have been infected with po-perie and other ill qualities and so become evil subjects." 'No Petty People'

But this was also the queen who proclaimed that she had no wish to make windows to pry into men's souls, and we can, I think, assume that she would have approved the decision in 1793 to admit Roman Catholics and would welcome the fact that Trinity is now nondenom-inational, interested in the scholarship of applicants, not in their religious allegiance. But it has never-theless been in its time the academic and spiritual home of the Anglo-Irish — "no petty people," as W.B. Yeats said of them — and these squares have been walked by distinguished representatives of the breed: Swift, Congreve, Berke-ley, Oscar Wilde, J.M. Synge. For me the most exciting buildings in Trinity is the museum. It is best viewed, preferably on a fine day, from the south across New Square. It was begun in 1853 and completed three years later, and the architects, Sir Thomas Dean and Registeries Woodward weers as and Benjamin Woodward, were responsible also for the successful alterations to the interior of the library. Despite the range of talk chimneys thrusting low on the medieval Dublin.

It is appropriate that its sponsor marble discs adorning the facade, it looks like a particularly well-pre-served palazzo; it is possible to imagine the shimmer of water flowing through New Square and see the gondolas rocking at the steps. The ground floor is open to the public, but as the door is usually closed one should press it boldly. Too many casual visitors, I suspect, miss the interior.

Inside the door the two flanking skeletons of prehistoric beasts and the display cases make the func-tion of the building immediately clear. But I could wish them away, the better to relish the ambiguities of the interior. Outside all is symmetry; here all is rich variety. A profusion of color, carving, pilasters, columns and arches, of changing light and vistas are held in marvelous balance so that the whole is totally harmonious. The twin domes patterned in blues, pink and cream, the arches of alternately colored bricks, the rows of pillars hinting at mysteries half concealed are Islamic in style and spirit; the building could be a osque. But the pillars and their fine capitals, the formally patterned floor and the wide, branching staircase remind one of some great department of state. And yet there is something, not exactly domestic, but companionable about the building. It invites, it does not intimidate. And the carving is magnificent, a profusion of naturalistic foliage, fruit, flowers and animals. The records show that it is an Anglo-Irish cooperation, the work of a Mr. Roe of Lambeth and of the O'Shea brothers of Cork.

The brothers were employed by the two architects to work also on the Oxford museum, but are said to have been sent back to Ireland because of drunkenness. Drunk or sober their work here is one of the delights of Trinity. No wonder John Ruskin described the museum as an architectural master-

The building to which the majority of Trinity's visitors first make their way is the old bbrary. not only for its own splendor but because it houses a treasure, the marvelously illuminated Gospel Book of Kells dating from the ear-ly part of the ninth century and reputed to come from the monastic center of Kells in County Meath. For such a treasure the Long Room of the library is an appropriate setting. The entrance is in New Square adjacent to the mod-era Berkeley Library, the first major building project undertaken by the college after 1900. The imposition of the modern on the old is always controversial. But unless architects are to be restricted to copies, good or bad, of past glories, the additions must reflect the needs, the aspirations, the spirit and the technical achievements of their own time, and Paul Koralek's prize-winning, solidly horizontal design makes its statement with confidence. The wide steps that lead to it lead also to the old library, which is approached through the library shop, a well-ar-ranged and agreeable place in which to find souvenirs; books and prints, woven scarfs, posters, pewter, jewelry and an excellent series of postcards of the Book of Kells. But it is still a slightly incon-gruous entry into the marvels above, stand at the entrance of the Long Room is to experience that quick-ening of the blood which is the re-sponse to wholly successful archi-tecture. The arched nave stretches in seeming infinity, cathedral-like in its majesty and dignity. Yet this is no church; the atmosphere is at once secular and academic, Hel-lenic rather than Christian, Its deities line either side in a series of 18th- and 19th-century busts by Peter Scheemakers, Louis François Roubillac, Simon Vierpyl and oth-ers. Their seemingly severed heads gleam pale against the richness of the paneling in symbolic potency: Greek philosophers, writers, scientists, statesmen, administrators, former provosts of the college, arranged in impressive solemnity.

The foundation stone of this building was laid in 1712, and the architect was Thomas Burgh. But, astonishingly, the high arched roof that is such a feature of the room was an 1860 addition when the gallery was continued upwards to branch into this great barrel vault. century classicism and 19th-century Romanesque that it is hard to believe that the interior was not originally designed as it now stands. On a sunny day in particular (and one should reserve a fine day for Trinity) the whole nave glows; the spines of the leather-bound books, mounting tier on tier, gleam against the rich and varied browns of the wood so that the gallery seems like a gigantic treasure chest lined with strips of golden mosaic.

The Treasured Book

And so to the treasure. I first saw the Book of Kells oearly 40 years ago and it was then open at the page showing a stolidly scated Virgin holding on her lap an aston-ishingly mature and adolescently long-haired Christ. The symbolism of these icon-like figures, so important to an understanding of the work, must then have escaped me: that the size of the Mother repre-sents her majesty, the maturity of the child His innate wisdom and power. Each of these full-size pag-es showing scenes from the life of Christ and the Evangelists is framed by a brilliant, intricately designed border of interlacings, circles, swirls, design within design.

Every page is a wonder. The in-tial letters are almost obscured by the intricacies of the decoration: brightly colored peacocks, tum-bling figures, inquisitive angels, grotesque monsters with protrud-ing tongues. One visit is oot enough even to begin to penetrate the mystery of this extraordinary book. One sees in imagination that long dead hand moving slowly across the vellum. And it must, surely, have been a young hand. Old eyes working by candlelight could hardly have produced such fine and intricate detail. And there must have been more than one illustrator, not only because of the sheer size of the work - 340 pages have survived - but because of obvious differences of style and workmanship.

The result is a manuscript that combines remarkably the skills of superlative craftmanship with in-spired creativity. To see the faint lines scored on the velium as a guide to the letterist is to experience an almost physical sense of library and the treasure it holds.

Harvester Has Quarterly Loss of $299.4 Million

CHICAGO — International Harvester announced a fiscal first-quarter net loss of $299.4 million at its annual stockholders meeting Thursday. Chairman Archie R. McCardell blamed the losses on a depressed market and high interest rates, but he predicted a return to profitability in the second half of fiscal 1982.

Harvester said it posted a $296.7-million loss from continuing operations in the quarter ended Jan. 31, compared with a $104.6-million loss a year earlier. The continuing losses come on top of $1.1 billion in losses posted during the last two fiscal years.

Alsands Backers to Stay, But Seek Concessions

CALGARY -- The five remaining members of the consortium backing the $13-billion Alsands project have decided to stick with the project, consortium president Edward Czaja said Thursday.

But he said the federal and Alberta governments will have to make further concessions to keep the stalled synthetic oil project alive. And he said the project would be dropped if it is not under way by midyear.

Earlier this year, Amoco Canada, a unit of Standard Oil, and Chevron Standard, a unit of Standard Oil of California, withdrew their combined 18-percent interest in the project.

12 Japanese Firms Set Video Tape Standards

TOKYO - Twelve Japanese manufacturers of video tape recorders and tapes have agreed to unify standards of eight-hour cassette tapes for VHS-format video recorders, Victor of Japan (JVC) said Thursday. They plan to market the tapes here beginning next month, IVC said. The 12 firms are IVC, Akai Electric, Konishiroku Amper, TDK Electronics, Matsushita Electric, Hitachi, Sharp, Fuji Photo Film, Sanyo Electric, Mitsubishi Electric, Sumitomo 3M and Hitachi Maxell.

5 Firms Win Bids on $1.4-Billion Saudi Refinery.

JIDDA - Five firms won contracts to build a $1.4-billion refinery in Jubail, a joint venture between Petromin of Saudi Arabia and the Royal Dutch Shell group, Petromin sucrees said Thursday.

The contractors are Chiyoda Petrostar of Saudi Arabia, Technip of Saudi Arabia, Parsons International of the United States, Chiyoda Chemical Engineering and Construction of Japan, and Technip of France, they said. The refinery, with a capacity of 250,000 barrels per day, is to be completed in 1984.

Deutsche Lufthansa Expects Small '81 Profit

Lufthansa said Thursday that second-half 1981 showed improved results over the first half but operating losses will remain above 100 million DM. It said 1981 profits were achieved with the help of sharply increased normal writeoffs which, together with extraordinary writeoffs, totaled 376.2 million DM in 1980.

P&G's pretax margin, mean-time, increased about 1.5 percentage points, to 12.8 percent, in the first six months of the fiscal year 1982, ended Dec. 31. The margin increase reflects a general retreat in the prices of commodities. Also, there is increased efficiency arising out of higher plant-utilization

Oil Glut May Be a Huge Swamp

By Nicholas Moore

LONDON - The oil industry is beginning to suspect the current glut is bigger than it thought, Western oil company executives and energy officials said. Unless Saudi Arabia acts soon with a sizable and well-publicized output cut, it might be too late to halt the current price slide, they said.

The present underlying level of oil consumption may be below most recent estimates, and there are some doubts as to whether the traditional summer build-up of refiners' stocks will be big enough this year to buoy demand in the months when oil consumption is lowest, they said.

Most industry estimates oow put OPEC production at around 20 million barrels daily. This is 2 million below what several OPEC leaders predicted for this quarter when last au-tumn they fixed a price structure around a benchmark of $34 a barrel for Sandi light crude.

The low OPEC production total can be attributed in part to a reduction of oil companies surplus stocks, industry experts said, adding they do not know how large this draw down has been.

Most think up to 4 million barrels daily have flowed out. But some preliminary estimates reaching the International Energy Agency in Paris indicate a smaller figure and thus lower underlying demand, a Western government source said. One oil multinational estimates that in 1981 de-

Ailing India Begins Courting Multinationals

By Tyler Marshall

Los Angeles Times Service NEW DELHI — After years of thinly veiled hostility to Western business that culminated in 1978 with the withdrawal of Coca-Cola and IBM, India has begun actively seeking new investment by blueribbon, multinational companies.

The turnaround reflects a belief held by Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's government that a major injection of advanced technology is needed to make India's antiquated industrial sector more competi-

The growing trade deficit, which last year ballooned to a record $6 billion, is the biggest single economic threat facing her government

Late last year, India negotiated the largest loan ever granted by the international Monetary Fund $5.7 billion — to help with the balance-of-payments problem. India is also taking on large-scale com-mercial loans for the first time to eccelerate oil exploration. The new government thinking also reflects growing disillusion

The effort to attract new foreign investment is restricted almost exclusively to high-technology areas. Even here, local partners are mandatory and foreign ownership is in most cases limited to 40 percent. Exceptions to these rules are rare; but one is made for companies willing to forsake the large Indian market and export their entire pro-ment incentives, but not much.

The frustrations that bedeviled investors in India in the past, in-

The new government attitude and the wary response by American and other Western businessmen are both reflected in investment figures. A three-year decline in the value of U.S. investment here was turned around in 1979 and, according to the latest available Indian government estimates, increased from just under $400 million to about $500 million in the first six months of last year.

Among U.S. companies new to India, Pittsburgh-based Rockwell International recently invested $5 million in a joint venture with an Indian company, Bharat Forge, to produce truck axles. And AC Sparkplugs and Sterling Drug and Hospital Corp. of America reportedly have been seriously consider-ing joint ventures with local partners in India.

The government has already se-lected Chevron to develop a block off the west coast of Gujarat state. Some companies have been attracted by an access to Soviet markets made possible by New Delhi's nced to balance its growing trade with Moscow. Major purchases by India of arms and oil have driven the value of Soviet imports to an estimated $3 billion annually. India is hard-pressed to meet Soviet requests for consumer goods and manufactured items in return. So some foreign companies qualifying under India's 100-percent export program get both the benefit of the program — no required Indian ownership - and a maranteed market in the Soviet

IN MARCH, 1825, a magnificent al fresco dinner was given for 200 guests in London — it marked the commencement of work on a tunnel under the Thames to relieve the traffic jams on London bridges. This was the first numel to be built through a soft subsoil. The machine that made it possible was the invention of Marc Brunel, a French émigre inspired by the shipworm, whose shielded head with serrated edges and ability to line its tunnel with a hard secretion as it went provided the model for a technology that was to open up the un-

But the celebration was premature. Instead of three years, Brunel's tunnel took 18, and cost a fortune and several lives. During its heyday as a pedes-trian crossing, the tunnel with its arched corridors and gloomy gaslight, was a combined fair, market and flop house, familiarly called "Hades Hotel." It is now an unremarked part of the Underground.

Shallow Tunnels Seized by tunnel mania, visionaries imagined London's poor being sped through darkness to enjoy Sunday sunshine in the country. Instead wherever cheap transport went, the city followed, obliterating fields and villages. During the 1860s a network of shallow numels was constructed for underground railroads. Inadequately ventilated, they choked riders on the killing fumes for which the authorities brazenly claimed health-giving quali-ties. When electrification arrived in the 1880s the deep tunnels in which Londoners sheltered from bombs during World War II became possible but as early as 1875 a subway tunnel to France for borsedrawn traffic, was actually started. The "Chunnel" remains a project still.

The London Underground developed over decades by a very English system of trial and error. The French waited until the fin de siecle and creat-ed theirs by fiat. But before Paris opted for a Mêtro it almost got an el instead, featuring a roonorail to run straight across the Place de l'Opéra. In the end Paris went underground, where the subsoil was already a ghost city of sewers, bone-strewn burial tunnels, and galleries for mushroom culnels, and galleries for musicion cul-ture. The first line, each station marked by its Art Nouveau edicule (only seven remain), opened in 1900 after two years work by oddly mixed gangs, comprising "several ruined businessmen, a group of acrobats, a dentist and a marquis." (The crew that built New York's IRT included two poets. E.A. Robinson and John two poets, E.A. Robinson and John Masefield.)

The engineers who proposed designs for a New York subway system as early as the 1850s were, like Brunel, curious, heroic figures, bursting with Victorian energies and proliferating talents. Alfred Beach, first editor of Scientific American, secretly built a 312-foot pneumatic tube, carting away earth at night, in hopes of demonstrating by a fait accompli, that tunneling under the streets wouldn't make the buildings fall down. He succeeded in this; better yet, his subway car, smoothly propelled by a manmoth fan, was capable of 60 mph. Another brilliant engineer named Robinson proposed a luxurious under-ground railway to run by synchro-nized electric clocks (this was the 1860s) and to carry freight after midnight. But subway travel remained a dream, while overcrowded els were built instead, darkening the clamor-

At the century's end, New York at last got its subway. The ground breaking ceremonies suggest an age of inno-cence; Sousa's band played, cannons fired 21-gun salutes, and fireworks lit the sky. The jubilation was not shared by the engineer, William Parsons, an-other extraordinary man, who while he labored at his plans was convinced that transport could not keep up with urban growth, and worse that cities and civilization itself were doomed.

The air below, in spite of electric power, remained foul, but the poppyred roofs of the cars and the kiosks at each entrance, mimicking Turkish summer pavilions (not even one is left), gave the ride underground a modest aesthetic value. Even advertising, for a high-minded moment, was forbidden. At a nickel a ride, the subway ran at a 56 million annual profit.

In recent years subways .... with the horrible exception of New York's .... have made underground travel ever more convenient and agreeable. Nothing built since the 1930s can rival the Moscow metro for splendor and efficiency, though its human cost was wicked. Under the charge of Nikita Khrushchev, 80,000 "volunteers" built it "the Bolshevik way" --- no one knows how many were crushed, drowned, or died of the bends. The elegant subways of Mexico, Stock-holm, Washington, Rome and Tokyo provide excellent service at no such intolerable price, though the over-erowding in the Tokyo underground crowding in the Tokyo underground has put Japanese ingenuity to the test: the exertion of getting into a parked car "is a good pre-work warmup" and "rush-hour coats" are sold with "a slippery surface for slithering through crowds."

Ominous Metaphor

"Labyrinths of Iron" is skillful in its description of engineering and fi-nancial problems and lively with anecdote, though without a coherent thesis. Bobrick, who writes well, is a poet (though one who misquotes "The Deserted Village") and he uses the un-derworld as an omnous metaphor. Vergil's Hades was recreated in the 18th century not by nature but man, who built underground cines for coal mining while the green fields above became a burning wasteland where the only chirp heard was not that of birds but windlasses. The agent of this transformation was in a sense the sub-way. "The first railway had in fact been a sort of subway, serving the underground cities of iron and coal. It emerged from the mine, carrying its age across the land, then plunged back into the earth, in time taking much of the rest of the world along." And there, in the Underworld, those who place their faith in nuclear deterrence imagine that life can go on. Even the Métro's dragonfly edicules can hardly rival the souring splendors of the stations built during the great age of railway travel, which are celebrated and thoughtfully criticized in "All Stations," the catalog of a fascinating exhibition that toured Europe.

When they were new, early in the 19th century, railway stations were seen as symbolic gateways to distant places, to the future itself, paradoxically constructed both to welcome that future and disguise it from the anxious traveler. Behind the architect's noble essay in the style of a Roman bath or a gothic cathedral lay hidden the engineer's great iron-and-glass train shed.

Stations built later in our century have come to renounce the rich emo-tional content of their forerunners for a cold, inhuman neutrality configured rather than alleviated by inescapable canned music. Nothing demonstrates this contract better them the design. this contrast better than the destruction of London's Euston Station with its free-standing Doric arch and noble waiting room for a replacement resembling a garage.

This handsome book is replet with the fantasies in iron and store of a richer past — the spectacular greenand-gold buffet of a Moscowstation that dwarfs the diners; the green vaulted spaces of Pennsylvania Staten, pitileschy proposed ilessly wrecked and replaced by a cheap tower block that hees the trains in its sinister base ent; a project for a central station in Paris resembling (to paraphrase Sydney Smith) a Grand Palais thanas farrowed; the huge fortress state on of St. Louis, now useless in a langthat has scuttled the railway.

The volume does not igner the sta-tion's central part in the tigedies of modern history, and a ter ble image lingers of the three tracks eading to the entrance to Auschwitz on a dark winter day. Thin snow etc. the roof tiles, the ties, a heap of disarded jugs and basin. The tracks jin to pass through the gates of hell.

IN the diagramed deal the North-South cards just about justify a slam effort. South has excellent chances in six hearts if he can avoid the loss of a trump trick.

The jump preference to four hearts by North on the second round sug-gested mild slam interest, and South drove to six hearts, although knowing that he would lose a spade trick.

In practice both red suits broke evenly, and South had no trouble af-ter a spade lead to the queen and ace, followed by a club shift. South won the second trick in dummy with the club king and eventually ruffed out the diamonds. South would probably have been defeated if East had held a doubleton diamond, so he could and should have adopted an alternative line of play that is slightly superior but not obvi-

On the first trick the soade nine or ten should have been finessed, and East would have won with the jack. Since East can be presumed to have the spade ace, that card can be ruffed out at some stage. Then the spade winners provide for the diamond losers in the closed hand. However, that line of play runs a slight risk: It is just possible that a cunning West has undeted the spade ace, in which case Sout will find that he has lost two spade tricks, to his chagrin. This particular defensive coup is very rare.

Injured Cooney Will Wait Until June to Meet Holmes

NEW YORK — The Larry Holmes-Gerry Cooney heavyweight title fight has been postponed from March 15 to June 11 after Cooney was examined by three physicians for a partially torn muscle behind his left shoulder.

"I feel very hurt that the fight will not take place in March,"
Cooney said Wednesday at a news conference at the New York University Medical Center, where the examination took place. "If all I was looking for was the money, we wouldn't be here now, and I'd be in there March 15. My goal is winning the heavyweight championship of the world."

Cooney burt his shoulder while sparring last month. The muscle tear was diangnosed and the injury was revealed at a news conference here Jan. 21. Cooney didn't attempt to spar again until last week, and when he did he couldn't hook, according to his trainer.

For Owners, Baseball Strike Looks Costlier All the Time By Thomas Boswell

Washington Post Service WASHINGTON — The results

are in on last year's baseball strike.
The mescapable conclusion: For the owners, it was all for naught. Baseball's salary-inflation spiral the root cause of the strike and its real issue - has not been affected by the battle that cost the average franchise about $1 million and the average player nearly $60,000. When the last contract is signed and the last decimal point comput-ed, the mean major league salary for 1982 will be about $235,000 an increase in one year of nearly $50,000 per player, according to the players' union.

Marvin Miller, the union presi-dent, says the dramatic upward graph of player salaries since the free agent era began in 1976 "hasn't changed at all." This sea-"hasn't changed at all. I has sca-son's salary jump, he says, "will be an all-time high," and even the rate of increase — 25 percent to 30 per-cent — will apparently be compa-rable to that of the last five sea-

Few, if any, in management disagree with Miller's appraisal. A Discouraging Month

This month has been particularly discouraging for those among baseball's hierarchy who, in the wake of their get-tough, last-stand strike, dreamed of easier financial strike, dreamed of easter imancial times. The signings of Gary Carter by Montreal, for approximately $15 million for eight years, and George Foster by the New York Mets, for $8.5 million for five years, are the latest examples that this is not the case. this is not the case.

The ever-increasing salaries are "like lava coming down the mountain at us," says Dick Wagner, the president of the Cincinnati Reds, who have lost Foster, Ken Griffey and Dave Collins from the payroll but still find themselves in the game's upper-echelon pay bracket. "It's the worst salary explosion we've had. At some point, things have to blow apart."

John McHale, the Montreal Expos' president, who signed Carter this week for almost $2 million a year, says, "It's very scary. We're all betting the game will keep drawing people and that we'll be a winner. A great separation is coming in baseball between the haves and the have-nots. All of us are fighting to keep what we've got.
We can't afford not to sign players. like Carter because we have to keep them to keep winning. It's a continual Catch-22."

Roy Eisenhardt, the Oakland A's owner, says of the cycle of desperation spending: "We are watching the definition of inflationary psychology in action. We rush to buy players on the assump-tion that if you don't buy today cost even more tomorrow

I sense an instinct for constraint" among owners, says Eisenhardt, who is co-chairman of baseball's restructuring committee. But we seem incapable of executing it."

"I get depressed," says Jerry Reinsdorf, one of the owners of the Chicago White Sox. "These 26 day.

clubs talk about how they're in a partnership, but then they act like they're out to kill each other." The clubs are "waiting for pay TV to give us a margin for error," he says. "Now, we have none. That's no way to do business."

In this dollar vortex, rich and poor are intertwined like the drowning man who drags down the lifeguard trying to save him. As Baltimore's general manager, Hank Peters, says, "Because of salary arbitration, everybody is linked. The salary precedents established by the few can be devastating to many." At the bottom of the pile, where resigned-to-defeat clubs are just trying to survive, let alone compete, the wailing is just as loud. San Diego's president, Hallard Smith, whose team has opted for a $3-million payroll and has minimal chance of escaping the cellar laments, "After looking at all the numbers...we're almost better off losing than winning."

Smith says that if his team suddealy started winning, it might ruin the franchise, because with salary arbitration, "our payroll could go up to $7 million in two years." Smith doubts his market could provide the 2.5 million cus-tomers that he says would then he needed to break even.

Smith says his franchise must draw 1,750,000 to break even on a $3-million payroll and that "we probably won't draw more than 1 million" in 1982. The team has never drawn more than 1,650,000. "I'm not sure we could draw 2.5 million," he says, "if we won the World Series."

Losing Cheaply

The Expos' McHale estimates the payroll for a contending team at between $6.5 million and $10

So, for the time being, losing cheaply may be the way to for teams like San Diego, Seattle and Minnesota to survive - in the ab-sence of revenue sharing, especialthe parceling of future cable TV cash. When richer owners tell Smith that sharing with the base-ball poor is Socialism, he says he replies that "revenue sharing may be creeping Socialism, but it's better than creeping bankruptcy."

"We didn't get anything out of the strike," Buzzie Bavasi, the conservative president of the California Angels, said recently. "Our

do one thing."

Bavasi said some players are worth the big salaries. In the days following the signing of Reggie Jackson (for $4 million for four years). Angel season ticket sales have jumped from 4,800 to 12,000. "We've got three million new dollars sitting in the bank drawing interest," Bavasi said. "Reggie paid for his whole contract in one week. But the price of mediocre ballplayers is killing us. A guy who's half as good as Reggie isn't worth half his salary. He doesn't get it back at the gate."

If the strike didn't solve the dollar drain, what will? Says Bavasi: "We've got to do it ourselves."

Miller thinks that's already hap-pened — illegally. It's the height of irony that as contract figures spiral upward, Miller is screaming that the owners are "colluding to hold down bidding on free agents."

Miller admits: "I don't have the smoking gun, but I have no doubt about the collusion... This game has existed on the basis of collusive agreements for a century — from the draft to the reserve

The pattern that Miller sees, supported by circumstantial evidence, is simple. He believes that no team bidding for a free agent has offered a contract for more than three years. Furthermore, no team has offered significantly more money per year than the player's original team has offered. Exhibit A in supporting this case is the testimony of Ron Guidry's agent, John Schneider, who says that none of the 13 teams that bid for Guidry at the winter meetings of the says that the says the says that the says ings offered more than a three-year contract or more than the approximate $1-million annual salary for which the Yankees eventually resigned the pitcher. Miller also believes that owners re-signing their own players as free agents are free, under a gentleman's agreement, to offer a contract of any length or any salary, such Guidry's four-year deal. Also, if the team losing a free agent acknowledges it has no interest in keeping him — as the Reds did in not even trying to resign Dave Collins (who signed for five years with the Yankees) — then, once again, the bidding is open. Finally, a team re-signing its own player, or trading for a player before he comes up for free agency, can offer the moon — as in the cases of Corter Footer and Philadelokis's Carter, Foster and Philadelphia's Mike Schmidt ($7.5 million for five years).

So, according to Miller, this is the scenario: The owners agreed to try to crimp free agency a tad. But because they can never agree on anything, they left loopholes. Thus, player salaries have rocketed another $50,000 a man. Owners vehemently deny collu-

The pattern on free agent signty of this particular free-agent crop," says Frank Cashen, the The idea that we're putting a cap on salaries should be completely dispelled by what's happened in the last couple of weeks." "If we're colluding," says Reins-dong a hell of a bad job of it. I'm have sworn off us aren't making any noise. They're just quietly igamazed at the salaries I see." If this winter's round of salary growth is baseball's latest destabi-

First, the preliminary, perhaps overly optimistic, reading is that fans are not nearly as bitter toward the game after the strike of '81 as it was first feared. Clubs are marveling at how little negative feedback they have been receiving and report that season and advance ticket sales are slightly better than expected

But as Baltimore's Peters put it. "Despite our good signs, I'm still very apprehensive. The fans who

Second, baseball is, in the words of Smith, "finally willing to talk about its real problems... and in baseball, that's a step forward." lizing news, the sport has two A Cool Approach

The 12-member restructuring committee, which has commis-sioned The Wharton School of Finance to study baseball, is trying to take a cool, temperate ap-

So far, most of the public talk coming out of the committee is about innocent-sounding propos-als — boring but dollar-wise matters such as pooling all transporta-tion costs, centralizing purchasing and marketing, having a director of television and such. Even more ambitious sugge tions are wrapped in lamb's cloth-ing. George M. Steinbrenner 3d, the owner of the New York Yankees, wants a new and separate "chief executive officer" for baseball — someone with a big-busi-ness background. The Baltimore owner, Edward Bermett Williams, wants the executive council to have greater power and serve as a board of directors.

It's complex and, at this stage, vague. On each issue, according to Reinsdorf, owners line up differently, depending on what's good for them. No firm coalitions have formed. "The one question we have to face, and we haven't faced it yet," says Smith, "is, Just what sort of partnership are we in?"

That, finally, is likely to be 'face, and we haven't faced it yet," That, finally, is likely to be where the "restructuring" lines are drawn — between baseball's haves and its have-nots.

year, we're going to have four A teams — the Yankees, Phillies, Astros and Angels - with player payrolls that are bigger than the entire gross revenues of a half-dozen of our teams. That kind of imbalance can't continue."

able again), baseball faces the reality that almost nothing has

Such glamour stars as Foster, Carter, Schmidt, Jackson, and Guidry keep gravitating to the same eight or so clubs with the big-gest built-in revenue base. And, with the apparently imminent arrival of cable television in the megamarkets, the gap between clubs grossing $25 million a year or more and those that work from a base of $10 million or less may be widened further still.

For more than a century, baseball's ownership never has really defined the nature of its ambivalent partnership - half laissezfaire survival of the fittest, half communal comradeship. It's never been truly necessary. Now it is.

Getting Into a Box

By Russell Baker

NEW YORK — I saw it in a Bell PhoneCenter Store. The Stowaway telephone. "Shuts up inside a solid wood chest," the literature explained. "Perfect for places where other telephones look out of place, because it doesn't look like a telephone."

It came in three decorator styles: Mediter-ranean, contemporary oiled walnut and a rolltop model. "With the lid closed, no one that there's a phone incide.

I took the rolltop model. I've always wanted a rolltop desk small enough to tuck under my arm. I fancied great sport ahead with friends when I sat down at my tiny rolltop desk pretending to get ready to write a check, then rolled the top back and produced a telephone. They'd never guess there was a phone inside — or would

I ran a test. Six people invited to the house, the phone tucked inconspicuously into its miniature roll-top desk in the kitchen. Not one suspected the phone lying within. In fact, oo one noticed the minia-ture rolltop desk, and if they didn't notice the desk, how could one begin to wonder what mystery it con-

It was galling. What was the point of the thing if people didn't notice it and speculate erroneously about its contents. I decided to sow suspicions among them.

The following week I retained a cabinetmaker and commissioned him to encase the refrigerator in a huge rolltop desk. When he had done the job. I had my friends back, having first placed the small telephone-cootainer rolltop on the counter beside the refrigerator.

Another failure ensued. The only reaction came from a woman who asked, "Did't you used to

"It's still here." I said.
"I thought so," she said, and that was the end of it. Not so much as a, "But where in the world have you got it?" did I get out of her. The cabinetmaker was busy the following week. When my friends returned, rolltop desks had been built to encase the stove, the table, the chairs, the chopping block and the garbage can. My guests glanced in and suggested we sit in the parlor, and one of them said, "Why don't you get away for a few weeks and relax? Would anyone like to make a telephone call?" I asked. No, no one did. "

You'd never suspect where the telephone is," I said. "Speaking of which," said one of them, "did you suspect for one second that supply-side economics would ever work?" Next day I visited a tailor. "Well, if I can get a carpenter I'll see what we can do," he said. Three weeks later I was standing somewhat stiffly in my apartment awaiting my friends' arrival. I was wearing a handsomely crafted rolltop desk of unusual shape, being more than six feet high and nearly three feet wide.

When I rolled the top down oo one would have guessed there was a man inside, or so the tailor as-

I left the door ajar for my visitors and was standing in the center of the kitchen with my rolltop down when they entered.

"He probably ducked out to buy a bottle of gin," one of them said, leaning against my oew rolltop suit and never suspecting there was a host inside.

"Do you notice anything funny about this place?" asked another. "Now that you mention it," his wife said, "I do. There aren't any cockroaches."

Determined to rouse their suspicions so they would suspect the wrong thing, I lit a cigarette and exhaled. That rolltop desk you're leaning on appears to be smoking." one of the guests observed.

"Well it can smoke if it wants to," said another, "but I'm oot staying around to have my lungs fouled with that poisonous gas.

Let's get out of here."

Unfortunately I made an unpleasant discovery upon trying to raise the rolltop to get out. It seems to be locked, and I can find oo key, Just this bit of foolscap and a quill. I am writing very calmly to avoid panic. The cleaning woman will come in day after tomorrow and ootice the oew rolltop desk in the center of the room. If only she will guess that there's an employer inside.

Maya Angelou

'The Idea Is to Write It So That People Hear It And It . . . Goes Straight to the Heart

By Lynn Darling Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — She has lived her life close to the bone, Maya Angelou, clung to every rung of the ladder: poor black country girl, living in a town oo bigger than its own squint-eyed view of the world; grand slam success making fast tracks through the literary world; and in between, mother, stripper, activist, editor, fry-cook, waitress, fund raiser, singer, actress, dancer.

She has stormed through her life with hurricane intensity and written about it with much the same force in four volumes of autobiography. "She is outside and inside at the same time, looking at all of it with double vision," wrote Ward Just when the first volume, "I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings," was published.

Maya Angelou smiles a smile that starts out easily enough bot ends in something of a wince, as if sorrow was always there. Her wide-set eyes are warm and wary, set in a face in which experience has etched a rough beauty. Her voice is deep and low. bearing her words along fast-moving cur-

'A Visitation of My Mortality'

There was something she learned a long time ago that has helped her survive. "Long ago, when I was about 2I, I had a visitation of my mortality," she says. "I suddenly realized that I wouldn't live forever, and it so frightened me that I may have gooe through a mild breakdown."

For several months, she says now, she was unable to sleep. "but I finally came through it, and admitted that I would die, that it was the one promise that would oot be reneged on. Now given that, what will I do, what can buy me to do anything? They can't buy me life. . . . I think most people murder other people, are unkind, brutalize, violate other people, allow themselves to be murdered, commit suicide, allow themselves to be violated, sell their full families off for messes of pottage, because they are afraid to die. That somehow these things will give them one more day. So once you get beyond that, your whole life is distilled. Every moment is precious.

"You bring all your equipment to everything, bolding back oothing because that might be the last moment. I am constantly aware of that, which makes me existential in a very strange and serious way. So that all my stuff is here. I mean all my stuff is here. So that when I get on that plane tonight, and if it falls, it falls, but darlin' I will have been as present as possible, and as courageous as possible, and not a bore. Not a drag."

Now 53, she has been teaching at Wake Forest University in North Carolina on and off since 1971 and will become Rey-

Angelon: Storming through life.

oolds Professor of American Studies there

Her odyssey began in Stamps, Ark, where Angelou, then Marguerite Johnson, and ber brother Bailey moved when she was 3 and be was 4 following the breakup of their parent's marriage. For IO years she was raised by her grandmother, stern, righteous and loving, who owned a general store that provided a center for life in the black part of town, and there ber granddaughter grew up.

Heroes and She-roes

Her grandmother and her brother were heroes to ber, and the overriding theme in ber work, she says, is "that people live in direct relation to the heroes and she-roes they have. If individuals or groupings have noble beroes and she-roes, and I use the word ooble meaning the best that we are, then that admiration lifts that person from baser pursuits." Writers were important as well: "I loved Paul Lawrence Dunbar. I loved Edgar Allan Poe. I loved the writers. Because I went through a period in my life, for about five years, when I was a mute, and words, written words, were everything to me.

She became mute soon after she was raped at the age of 8 by her mother's boyfriend, a man who was found beaten to death shortly afterward. The little girl felt responsible for the death, the way children often take up burdens that balance precariously on inexperienced shoulders, and she decided she had to do something.

"I had to stop talking," she wrote in "I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings," "I dis-covered that to achieve perfect personal silence, all I had to do was to attach myself leech-like to sound. I began to listeo to everything. I probably boped that after I heard them and packed them down, deep in my ears, the world would be quies around me.

"That condition, in its intensity, left me when I was about 13," she says now. "Occasionally. I find that the affliction is a little like malaria. It stays in the body, and from time to time, I reduce back to that."

For over a decade oow, she has chosen the subject of herself as the centerpiece of her working life, and while that developed quickly into a passion, it began as more of a challenge. "I was living in New York to 1967, and I thought of myself as a poet and a playwright and so forth. One night, James Baldwin took me out to dinner, to Jules and Judy Feiffer's. We were just four." After dinner, they told stories, Judy Feiffer called a friend at Random House who promptly called Angelou and asked ber if she was interested in writing ber autobiography.

She said oo; the offer was repeated several times, even after she had moved to the West Coast to produce a series for educaoonal television. "The last time [the editor] called," she remembers, "he said, 'Well I can understand you refusing to write an autobiography, and it's probably best that you don't, because it's almost imposible to write autobiography as literature. I said.
"I'll do it. It may kill me, but I'm going to die anyway, so why oot do it."

Early in the morning in a hotel room, in the spare, anonymous space, she would recreate her life, letting the room fill up with memory and meaning. She kept a Bible, a dictionary, a bottle of sherry, a crossword puzzle and a pack of playing cards there, and the yellow pads on which she wrote. "Sometimes it takes an bour and a half to shuffle off all that stuff, u's like taking off you clothes. And then you're back, it's like a time machine. Then you're there, and ooce you're there, you just pour out the stuff, what you see, and what you remember. The idea is to write it so that people hear it and it slides through the brain and goes straight to the heart."

New York Stage Role

The latest volume takes her from life in Laurel Canyon, where she earned her living singing in a nightclub, to the tough scrape for life in New York City, where she starred in a cast that included Cicely Tyson, Godfrey Cambridge and James Earl Jones in Genet's "The Blacks," and worked as the oorthern coordinator for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference — until she met Vusumzi Make, a South African freedom ligher with whom she fell in love a week after they'd met.

The revolution did oot begin at home -Make was hostile to the idea of her working, noochalant to the point of eviction toward the concept of paying the rent, and frankly astonished at her expectations of fidelity. Finally, in Egypt, where she was the associate editor of a magazine called the Arab Observer, she left him, but not before she was called before a "palayer" of their mutual friends in Cairo who debated the pros and cons of her decision.

Years before I had understood that all I had to do, really had to do, was stay black and die," she writes in her latest au-tobiographical volume, "The Heart of a Woman." "Nothing could be more interestiog than the first or more permanent than the latter. In truly critical moments I reminded myself of those discoveries."

The book is filled with the bright promise of the early '60s, when every event to which she turned her attention was filled with the excitement of the possible. Looking back, she feels that the promise "was tragically defaulted upon. I believe this couptry had a chance. It was as if the late '50s and early '60s were divice gifts that we unfortunately buried through ignorance and greed, but mostly through ignorance. We're on a downward slide, I think the country's citizens are obliged now to look at their choices - the budget outs are going to make for some interesting ones."

But she is out one to bluot the present by comparing it to the past. "The issue of trying to stay alive and find some grits to put on the table, and somebody to just give you some respect, you know, not even love, just respect, of finding a place to perpetu-ate one's God, these are issues very real and practical to 90 percent of the people in this country."

Another Plunge

Recently the roller coaster took another plunge - her marriage to budder Paul du Feu, "a marriage which was the eternal, never-to-be-broken-up-marriage, broke. I decided to give California a rest." The "love of other burnan beings" has always been central to her, she says, but she will oot say exactly which marriage this last one was. But she does oot think it was her last. "For awhile, I thought, 'That's it. I've done my best.' But now, I doo't know. Lately I've noticed a little glint in my eye. I looked in the mirror and there was something there. There's a saying, you know —
'Old don't mean cold.'

Maya Angelou takes pride in her son and joy where she can find it. Guy Johnson, who was born to her when she was 16, is a poet in his own right, and the director of personnel for Santa Rosa, Calif. Mother and son are living moment to moment these days, ever since her son's wife disappeared with their 5-year-old soo, The mother went underground with him. We doo's know where he is. My son is hanging on to his sanity with his fingernails."

No, says Maya Angelou, "life doesn't get any easier, But I'm alive, I have a chance of making it better. Sometimes it's going to be better, and sometimes it's going to be worse and part of the commitment one makes to life is to hang on. Life," she says, "loves the livers of it,"

La Scala Reschedules Opera With Caballe

Monserrat Caballe will star in the Donizetti opera "Anna Bole-na" at La Scala after all. The Spanish soprano was to have sung it at the opera's opening in Milan Sunday but called in sick at the last moment. La Scala tried to substitute U.S. soprano Ruth Falcon, but the venerable theater's chic first-night audience was not amused forcing cancellation of the performance with uochic catealls, hoots, whistles and boos. La Scala officials announced that the opera will be staged this coming Sunday, with Cuballe in the title role.

Actor Lee Majors decided to let his former wife Farrah Fawcett have their $2.375 million Holly-wood Hills house. Fawcett will pay Majors half the value of the house to get sole possession. Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Harry T. Shafer, who granted the couple a divorce Tuesday, bad declared the house community property, but said he wanted to visit the 10,000square-foot home before deciding on possession. The visit became unnecessary when Fawcett's attorney informed the judge that Majors had met with Fawcett and agreed let her have the house, Buckingham Palace rebuked two British newspapers for publishing pictures of Diana, Princess of Wales, nearly six months preg-nant, swimming and sunbathing in a bikini in the Bahamas. A palace spokesman said it was tasteless and had upset Queen Elizabeth. The spokesman said the telephone switchboard at the palace had been jammed with calls from people complaining about the photographs. The pictures were carried io the Sun. Britain's higgest-selling daily, and the Daily Star.

Former Gov. George Wallace plans to comply with an Alabama state Ethics Commission ruling that he must drop one of his two state paychecks, an aide says. The commission decided that Wallace's $18,000-a-year job as counselor to Gov-Fob James conflicts with his $68,355 a-year post as director of rehabilitation services for the University of Alabama at Birming-ham. Elvin Stanton, a Wallace aide, said the former governor "has oo problem" with the ruling. "He'll do whatever the Ethics Coomissioo wants him to do." He would oot say which jub the governor would give up.
